

Activity name: A new country

Short description:

The participants will have to create an imaginary bill of rights for their new country and find correspondences between their ideas and specific articles of the UDHR.

Things needed:

- a group of students/people
- pens
- paper

This activity can start from this proposed scenario:

A small new country has been created on a faraway island. There are no laws, no rules, no history. Your group are its founders, thus you have been appointed to draw up a bill of rights for this New Country.

The participants, working in small groups have to give this country a name and to write ten rights, that the entire team can agree on. Later, each group will present their countries with their respective lists and compare them to existing UDHR articles. A discussion on what rights did the participants find more important and which ones have they omitted will take place.
